So every time you start your computer you are presented with the following message: 24.5.09 gated disc. In case you'd like to read the whole transcript of our interview, visit the link below. Being the editor-in-chief of Metro, it's not a huge surprise that Massimo is a big fan of reading and that in his spare time he likes to cultivate a personal media collection. He was kind enough to allow me to borrow some of his pastime for the blogosphere. We were standing in San Giovanni, the most beautiful and tiny church of the early 20th century. I was giddy to be in a building where I could reach into the wall and touch a St. Augustine. When Massimo asked me what I thought the "gates of heaven" were, I told him a while ago someone gave me a Gateways and Paths CD which we shared a few weeks ago. It's an eclectic, beautifully produced and packaged book on the influence of the Middle Ages on various fields of study. Massimo's editions were particularly influential. Metro: That's an interesting way to tell a story. It has always been one of my goals to keep putting books out there in creative ways. Massimo: Do you remember anything about the art director, or if it was a studio effort or if it was sort of your own responsibility? Massimo: Well, I don't really know, I mean I know the art director but I was also involved in the design process. The design was sort of inspired by having the exact same wall materials that you use for the books you write, in my case paper and binding. How did you come to meet Gustav Klimt? Metro: What I remember about meeting Gustav Klimt is that he is known to be a really great tennis player. Massimo: Right, and that he was called a "passionate playboy" which is a term that in translation means that he was playing tennis. I'm Italian, I know how to speak english but
